Let It Burn Russell Madden
A 1700 word essay examining the proper evaluation of cross burning.

Free-expression, of course, is a right only when conducted on and/or via your own property or that of willing others. The travesty of “public” property creates significant problems in this regard since the property is simultaneously owned by everyone and by no one.

“Feeling” threatened is not the same thing as being threatened. A real threat needs to be one that is actually being made by someone and that can be proven to be a legitimate peril (assuming it is not a real immediate risk such as a robber breaking into your house and pointing a gun at you). Granting full credence and acceptance to the “feelings” of an observer destroys objective law.

Along with this problem is that of equating a symbol with a physical threat. In a general sense, speaking words is an action, yes, but the old saying generally holds true regarding the difference between “sticks and stones” and “words.” I may feel emotional “hurt” or “pain” when someone says mean things to me, but that hurt or pain does not violate any of my rights as would the damage from a fist or a slug or a stone wielded by another person and contacting my body.
